Postdocs and Early-Career Researchers: Be More than a Name on a Website

By David Payne for NatureJobs

After a few months working as an associate editor at Nature Photonics, chief editor Oliver Graydon asked Gaia Donati if the role was what she had imagined it to be. She answered that in most aspects it had, with one significant exception: she hadn't realized that finding referees to assess submitted manuscripts would be such a daunting task!

Here, Gaia urges peer reviewers to make things easier by setting up a personal web page outlining their research experience and interests.

How Administrators Can Help Prepare Ph.D.s for Nonfaculty Careers

By L. Maren Wood for The Chronicle of Higher Education

For the past four years, I've worked as a career coach helping Ph.D.s prepare for nonfaculty job searches. Most come to me after several years on the academic job market. They have never thought about nor planned for a career beyond the professoriate.

I'm excited, then, that some institutions are experimenting with ways to prepare students for a range of career opportunities. As institutions build these programs, I'd ask that they keep two important points about the non-faculty job market in mind:

- People find jobs through their networks. Over 70 percent of jobs are never posted. Submitting a résumé to an online job posting, without a contact at that organization, works less than 4 percent of the time.

- Employers hire based on a combination of skills, knowledge, and abilities. Candidates must clearly articulate in professional documents and in-person interviews how their background can benefit an organization.

Wood suggests that institutions should build programs to address these two points. Here are a few ideas on how that might happen.

7 Strategies for Tenure-Track Success

By Tanya Golash-Boza for Inside Higher Ed Career Advice

Securing a tenure-track position in this academic market is difficult. Of course, once you have such a position, the trials are not over, as you now have to work to achieve tenure. And the very thought of working toward tenure can be overwhelming.

However, I encourage tenure-track faculty members not only to think about achieving tenure but to be strategic and focused to ensure you are on the right path. Even if tenure is a few years off, new tenure-track faculty can take a few important steps now (other than, of course, work on publishing their dissertations, improving their courses and developing new research projects). Here are a few examples.

The Art of the On-Campus Interview

By Mark W. Pleiss for Vitaes

I asked my mentor for advice before leaving for my first campus interview. It was 2015, I was about to finish my dissertation, and I was off to interview at a small liberal-arts college in the lower Midwest. In all truth, I was expecting to hear some traditional bit of wisdom: "The interview starts the second
